Summary of CV

This section describes briefly a summary of your career in science, academic and research; the main scientific and technological achievements and goals in your line of research in the medium -and long- term. It also includes other important aspects or peculiarities.

I received my PhD in History from the University of Barcelona in 2013 and I am currently working at the Centre for Demographic Studies (CED) as a Research Support Technician. I am also a member of the Research Group “Trabajo, Instituciones y Género” [Labour, Institutions and Gender] (TIG, PI: Dr. Cristina Borderías) since its creation in 1999.

I have been closely involved in several research projects developed by the TIG focused on Labour History from a gender perspective. At the same time, I conducted my own research, which culminated with the presentation of my Doctoral Thesis “Treball i Gènere a la Indústria Metal·lúrgica de Barcelona (segles XIX i XX)” [Labour and Gender in the Metallurgical Industry in Barcelona, 19th-20th Centuries], focused on the labour and living conditions of working class from a gender perspective.

My main research interests are Labour History, Family History and Gender History. However, since I joined the Department of Geography (UAB) and the Centre for Demographic Studies (CED) in 2013 and 2014, I have extended my lines of research accordingly with the “Five Centuries of Marriages” (5CofM) project (ERC_AdG). Within this project, I have been responsible for technical tasks, organizing the construction of the Barcelona Historical Marriage DataBase (BHMD) based on the data-mining of the 291 “Llibres d’Esposalles”, conserved at the Archives of the Barcelona Cathedral. I am also researching on the Catalan naming practices in a long term perspective (15th – 19th Centuries) and on the marriage patterns of French immigrants in Catalonia (16th-17th Centuries).

My involvement into the Department of Geography (UAB), through the requested grant “Juan de la Cierva-Incorporación”, and, in particular, in the different projects of the “Population Studies Group” (GEP) will allow me to start new lines of research within the Historical Demography and Social History as social mobility or migration. It should be remarked that my participation in this group will allow me to interact with top international researchers from an interdisciplinary perspective, which I am certain will be an eye opening academic experience. Thus, the GEP works with international networks such as the European Historical Population Samples Network (EHPS) (<http://www.ehps-net.eu/>) or the (European Labour History Network (ELHN) from disparate disciplines as well Computer Vision and Artificial Intelligence.

- Relevant results: This paper aims to analyse work's organisation in the metallurgical sector in the city of Barcelona, focusing on factors that influenced the business policies of work sexual segmentation and in the women workers' working conditions. Since there are no available macro-statistics to study in detail such a work organization in the sector, I turn to a case study, a tin-plate cans and boxes factory. The conclusions are that, by the late nineteenth century, in a situation of increasing competition, the need for saving costs led to a mechanisation of some parts of the productive process and this mechanisation involved that women started to be hired. The low feminine wages were fundamental to the firm's take-off and also to its success during the Francoism.

- Relevant results: This article aims to analyse the evolution of employment among a group of women belonging to the poorest section of Barcelona's working-class from the nineteen-thirties to the fifties. According to available –but unreliable– macro statistical data, Francoism witnessed the decline of married women participation in the labour force. The working trajectories of this group of women has been reconstructed –reliably– using a new source, the social security contribution records (1921-2004) which has allowed to correct their activity declaration in the Barcelona's municipal censuses (1930-1950). Thus, these women's activity rate are analysed from the household strategies but also from demand-side factors, such as changes in hiring policies among businessmen in the metallurgical sector, where most of the women held jobs during the period.

Relevant results: This article focuses on the analysis of the labour behaviour pattern of a group of female workers in the metallurgical industry, belonging the poorest of the working class of the city of Barcelona, and the factors that determined this. In order to do this we analyze their reconstructed working lives from Social Security records (1921-2004), taking into account supply factors –life cycle– as well as demand factors –hiring policies in the metallurgical sector, changes in the structure of the labour market–.

Relevant results: The aim of this article is to analyse the evolution of employment among a group of women in the poorest segment of Barcelona's working class in the period from the nineteen-thirties to the fifties. This period is especially significant because the available macrostatistical data suggests that Francoism caused a decline in the labour force participation rates of married women. These women's employment is analysed not only in the context of their strategies for household work, but also in terms of demand-side factors, such as changes in hiring policies among businessmen in the metallurgical sector, where most of the women held jobs.

Relevant results: The present article summarizes the experiences of the application of the Historical International Standard Classification of Occupations (HISCO) on the data for the Catalan population from the 15th to the 20th century. Using population and working class censuses as well as marriage registers, it demonstrates the advantages and disadvantages of HISCO as a coding system. The paper proposes different solutions in coding and classification methodologies in order to refine the occupational classification process.

Relevant results: In the last decades historians have provided new evidences showing the biases in the knowledge of female participation rates produced by traditional sources like the National Census of Population and Municipal Registers, both in Spain and elsewhere. This underreporting skews our understanding of the structure of labor markets, structural change and productivity of various economic sectors, as well as analysis of employment strategies within families, the determinants of female employment, the economic contribution of women to household and family living standards. This is leading researchers from different countries to seek alternative sources and methods that allow the reconstruction of female activity on more reliable sources. This article is part of a research project of this nature. By individual cross-referencing occupational data in the enumerator books with the occupation in workers census and waged books in some industrial catalan municipalities this article aims to identify the underreporting of female activity in the local enumerator books, adjusting labour force participation rates and provide new evidence to review some classical assumptions relating female activity to family life cycle.

Relevant results: This article draws attention to the need for reviewing some of the historiographic interpretations regarding the spontaneous character of CCOO and the democratic Spanish unionism like a "new labour movement" without connection with the historical trade unions as well as the "ignorance" of the new generations of CCOO unionists of the prewar political cultures. The article also highlights the different dimensions of the role of women in the labour and social movements and democratic trade unionism during the Francoism and provides elements to interpret their limited presence in union structures and the nature of the conflicts between men and women in work, the union and politics.

Relevant results: This article tries to overcome the stereotypes of traditional historiography about women's unionization. The present text, part of a wider project related with the creation of an "oral archive" by the Fundación Cipriano García - Archivo Histórico de la Comisión Obrera Nacional de Cataluña (AHCONC), point out some interpretative guidelines about women's involvement in labour movement. Finally, proposes a biographical profile of one of this interviewed women as well as her own reflexions about the suitability of biography as methodological tool in the reconstruction of feminine unionization and political participation.

Relevant results: This article presents ten biographical profiles of interviewed women within the project "Workers Biographies. Oral Sources and Unionization (1939-1978)". These profiles are an tool that the Arxiu Històric de la CONC wanted to present to the researchers to publicize this project of recovering the historical memory of the Catalan labour movement. The profiles outlines the experiences of these women in their jobs and the union as well as in their family and as individuals.

Relevant results: This study examines the impact of union policies on women's lower affiliation during the first third of the twentieth century, suggesting that from the end of the nineteenth century to the beginning of the 1930s, when working class associations grew and formal unions were constructed as male-centred institutions, the relation ship between them and women became increasingly conflictual. Consequently, women increased their autonomous mobilization. It is argued that masculinization of power structures and cultures in unions is a relevant factor to explain why women seeking empowerment turned to self-mobilization.

Relevant results: This study analyses the exclusionary strategies that professional associations and worker's unions belonging to the metallurgical sector launched during the first third of the twentieth century to face the slow, but progressive, process of feminization that was taking place encouraged by the mechanization of the productive means in the small metal articles' factories. The most radical opposition of the unions arose during the 1930s when the sector fell into a crisis. Unions achieved the prohibition that women were hired to do hard jobs, they restricted the employment of women as a machine operators imposing the equal pay between men and women and expelled them of the apprenticeship.

Relevant results: This article highlights the importance of recovering the memory of the clandestine union fight against the Franco's regime through the creation of an "oral archive" conformed by biographical interviews, a project directed by the Fundación Cipriano García - Archivo Histórico de la Comisión Obrera Nacional de Cataluña (AHCONC). This article also points out the importance of paying especial attention to the recovering of a "feminine" memory within the clandestine unions and it includes an a biographical profile of one of the interviewed women to show as the biography is an adequate mean to capture the specificity of the women's experience into the labour movement.
